Carnation<sup>3</sup> (karnē'jōn). Also 6 incarnacion, coron-, coronation. [Some 16th c. authors give one form of the name as coronation, apparently from its 16th c. specific name, Betonica coronaria, in allusion to its use in chaplets (cf. CAMPION), or from 'the flowers . . dented or toothed about . . like to a littell crownet' (Lyte).] On the other hand, Turner calls the plant an incarnacion, Lyte has carnation as well as coronation, and Geiarde expressly identifies it with the colour

'carnation'. Prior takes coronation as the original form, and Britten and Holland think his opinion 'probably correct'.

One or other name must have been due to popular mistake; carnation is alone found after 1600, and has apparently even modified the later application of 'carnation' as a colour-name: the flower, however, is not always of this colour; as Lyte says, 'some be of colour white, some carnation or of a lively fleshe colour, some be of a cleare or bright redde, some of a darke or deepe redde, and some speckled'.

Carnival (kā'nivāl). Forms: 6 carnoval, carnevale, 7 carnevall, carnivall, 7-8 carnavall, 7- carnival. [a. It. carnevale, carnevale (whence F. carnaval), evidently related to the med. L. (11-12th c.) names carnelecdrium, carnelecdria, carnelecdmen, cited by Carpenter in additions to Du Cange. These appear to originate in a L. **carneum levare*, or *It. *carne levare* with infinitive used subst. as in il levar del sole sunrise, meaning 'the putting away or removal of flesh (as food)', the name being originally proper to the eve of Ash Wednesday. The actual It. carnevale appears to have come through the intermediate carnelecale, cited by Carpenter from a document of 1130.

The history of the word is illustrated by the parallel med. L. name carneum levare (cited by Carpenter from a charter of 1050), corresp. to *It. *carne lasciare* 'leaving or forsaking flesh', whence, app. by contraction, the modern carnevale = carnevale. *Carneum levare, *carne lasciare, *carnelecale, carnelecale*, form a series exactly parallel to **carneum levare, *carne levare, carnelecale, carnevale*. Other names having a similar reference are, for Shrove Tuesday, carneficium 'flesh-taking', and carnefici [dies]; for Lent or its beginning, carneficium, carneficium, carneficium, carneficium, carneficium, carneficium. In all these, 'flesh' means meat, and that it was understood to mean the same in carnelevare is shown by many early quotations in Du Cange; e.g. in a MS. of beg. of 13th c. 'De ludo Carnelevar. In Dominica dimissionis carnis, etc. Also 'Dominica ad vel ante carnes tollendas'; with which compare the Spanish carne tolendas, shrove-tide. We must therefore entirely reject the suggestion founded on another sense of levare, 'to relieve, ease', that carnelevare meant 'the solace of the flesh (i.e. body)' before the austerities of Lent. The explanations 'farewell flesh, farewell to flesh' (from L. vale) found already in Florio, and 'down with flesh!' (from F. aval), belong to the domain of popular etymology. (Cf. Dr. Chancein N. & Q. s. 7 IV. 82.)

Originally (according to Tommaseo and Bellini) 'the day preceding the first of Lent'; commonly extended to the last three days or the whole week before Lent; in France it comprises Jeudi gras, Dimanche gras, Lundi gras and Mardi gras, i.e. Thursday before Quinquagesima, Quinquagesima Sunday, Monday, and Shrove Tuesday; in a still wider sense it includes 'the time of entertainments intervening between "Twelfth-day" (or Boxing Day) and Ash Wednesday' (Littre).

[a. OF. carole, also kar-, char-, quar-, quer-, kerole, -olle, in all the senses in which it occurs in Eng. (exc. 3); still in French dialects. (Marne carole dance, fête, joy; Swiss Rom. coraula, coraula, round dance, dance-song, coraul ball, round dance (Godef.), Pr. and It. carola; Old Pr. also corola. The ulterior etymology of OF. carole and its accompanying vb. caroler, is uncertain; nor is it clear whether the vb. or the sb. takes priority etymologically. There are many indications that the first syllable had originally co- (see Diez, 1878, p. 539, and cf. the Swiss and Breton forms); hence Romanic etymologists generally agree with Diez, in seeking the etymology in the Gr.-L. chorus, and its derivatives chorā, choraules, etc.: cf. esp. 'corolar vel coriar, coras duere' quoted by Diez from Faidit Gram. Prov., of 13th c. Wackemagel would take the vb. (coraulare 'canculare' to tread, dance, Ungtio) as a derivative of the sb. coraula, choraula, choraules, the fluteplayer who accompanied the chorus dance, and the sb. as a derivative of the vb. Another conjecture, assuming 'ring' to be the original sense of the sb., has proposed as its source L. corolla 'little crown, coronet, garland'. In any case, a Celtic origin is out of the question: Welsh carol (Christmas) carol, and vb. caroli to sing carols, are from English (Rhys), and Breton koroll dance, korolli to dance, koroller dancer, are from French. The arrangement of the senses here followed is tentative.]

An earlier L. carriāre in sense of 'load', became car-care, cargare, whence OF. charchier, chargier; see CHARGE. After this, was formed a new carriāre in sense of 'transport in a cart', which gave OF. carier, charier. Ultimately therefore carry has the same etymology as CAR, CHARGE, and CARGO.]

From the radical meaning which includes at once 'to remove or transport', and 'to support or bear up', arise two main divisions, in one of which (I.) 'removal' is the chief notion, and 'support' may be eliminated, as in 4, 5, and several of the fig. senses; while in the other (II.) 'support' is the prominent notion, and 'motion' (though usually retained) may entirely disappear. Cf. 'Do not leave the carpet-bag here; carry it up stairs', with 'Do not drag it along the floor; carry it'. For the former take is now largely substituted.

Carsay, carsey, obs. ff. of KERRY.

Carse (kɑ:s, So. kɑ:s). Sc. Forms: 4 kars, 6 cars, 7- carse. [Of uncertain derivation, but perhaps the same word as carres, carrs, cars, pl. of CARR sb. 2 fen, low wet land.

This suits the sense: the early quotations speak of the kars as full of pools and mires: Trivet describes the Carse of Falkirk in time of Edw. I. as loca palustris (Jam.). The suppression of the vowel of the plural is phonetically regular, and the retention of the (s) sound instead of its change to (z) is seen also in pence, dice, niche, truce (the latter also, like carse, made into a singular). Cf. also the change of Pierres, Feres to Piers, Pierce. The difficulty is that no early examples of kerris or carrs are found in Sc.; in Barbour the word is already kars. The Welsh cors 'marsh' suits the sense, but presents a difficulty in the vowel, as well as in the geographical localization of the word.]

The stretch of low alluvial land along the banks of some Scottish rivers:

'Thus all the flat lands, on the north side of Tay, between Perth and Dundee, are called the Carse of Gowrie; those on the Forth, the Carse of Stirling, and the Carse of Falkirk' (Jam.). The name appears to have originally referred to their wet ferny character, but is now associated with their rich fertility.

Cart (kär), sb. Forms: 3-7 carte, 3 karte, 3-4 karti, 6 (oharte), Sc. cairt, 3-cart. [OE. had cræt neut., pl. cratū, app. related to Du. krat neut. 'hind part of a cart' (which is, however, only mod. Du. and suspected to be of recent adoption). Some compare OHG. cratto, cresso, masc., MHG. kratte, kretze (m. and f.) basket, hamper, panier, mod. G. dial. krätze fem., basket (cf. CRATE), and suppose that OE. cræt was prop. a cart of basket-work, but of this there is no actual evidence. ON. had kart-r masc. 'cart', generally considered to be cognate with the OE. word; and since the ME. was always cart(e), and never crat, its direct source appears to have been the ON., rather than the OE. word.

If ME. carte had merely arisen by metathesis of r from OE. cræt, we should expect some overlapping of forms as in the case of bird, bird; one may note, however, that OE. cræt-wæn exists in mod. Welsh as cartuenn. Cart has entered from Eng. into most of the Celtic langs.; but is there palpably a foreign word]

L. caruica (f. caruiss CAR) was originally 'a sort of state coach or chariot'; this sense is still found anno 700 'caruica in qua sedere consuevi' (see Diez); but in Gaul it was early applied to the wheel-plough, in which sense caruica, carruca, caruus appear in the Salic and Allemannic Laws. Cf. the s.w. Eng. plough = 'wagon'.

A measure of land, varying with the nature of the soil, etc., being as much as could be tilled with one plough (with its team of 8 oxen) in a year; a plough-land.

The acreage of the carucate varied according to the system of tillage. If the land lay in three arable common fields the carucate, according to Fleta, contained 180 acres; 60 for fallow, 60 for winter corn, and 60 for spring corn. If the land lay in 2 fields the carucate consisted of 160 acres, 80 for fallow, and 80 for tillage. Commonly only the land under plough in any one year was reckoned, the fallow being thrown into common pasturage. Hence in ancient deeds the normal carucate is either 120 acres or 80 acres by the Norman number (5 score to the hundred) and 144 acres or 96 acres by the English number (6 score to the hundred).—*Rev. An instrument of torture, said to have been invented by the 'Master of Orkney' in 1596. Its action appears to have been forcibly to draw together the body and limbs of the victim, and hold him in this cramped position.

7. Case of Conscience: A practical question concerning which conscience may be in doubt; a question as to the application of recognized principles of faith and obedience to one's duty in a particular case or set of circumstances.

A transl. of L. casus conscientie (F. cas de conscience), according to Ames (1576-1633), 'called casus, because it is wont to happen or occur (caeteri) in life; and casus conscientie, because when it happens, conscience ought to give a judgement with the greatest carefulness'. These cases or questions are divided into two classes, (1) those which concern a man's state before God, (2) those which concern his actions in that state. It is mainly to the second of these, or cases of conduct, that CASUISTRY is understood to refer.

9. Grammar. [L. casus used to translate Gr. πτῶσις lit. 'falling, fall']

By Aristotle πτῶσις was applied to any derived, inflected, or extended form of the simple ὄνομα or ῥήμα (i.e. the nominative of nouns, the present indicative of verbs), such as the oblique cases of nouns, the variations of adjectives due to gender and comparison, also the derived adverb (e.g. δυνατός was a πτῶσις of δύναμις), the other tenses and moods of the verb, including also its interrogative form. The grammarians, following the Stoics, restricted πτῶσις to nouns, and included the nominative under the designation.]

a. In inflected languages, one of the varied forms of a substantive, adjective, or pronoun, which express the varied relations in which it may stand to some other word in the sentence, e.g. as subject or object of a verb, attribute to another noun, object of a preposition, etc. b. But as many modern languages have nearly or quite lost these variations of form, case is sometimes loosely used for the relation itself, whether indicated by distinct form or not.

Thus, by a mixture of the two notions, in modern English, substantives are commonly said to have three cases, nominative, objective, and possessive; the two former being merely relations, and the latter entirely formal; in modern French to have two (or three) cases, cas-sujet and cas-régime (the latter subdivided into direct and indirect), which are in the noun merely relations, while of the pronouns some retain only one case-form, some have four (e.g. ils, les, leur, eux). Thus also, in quot. 1824, 'nominative' case is loosely used for subject.

Cassock ('kæsək), sb. Forms: a. 6-7 cassacke, 7 cassack, (cass-, cassaque); β. 6 cassoke, cassooke, (8-9 cassoo), 6- cassook. [a. F. casaque 'a cassocke, mandilion, long coat', 16th c. in Littré, (corresp. to Sp. and Pg. casaca 'a souldiers cassocke, a frock, a horsemans coat', Minshew, It. casaca 'a frocke, a horse-mans cote, a long cote; also a habitation or dwelling' Florio). The military use is the original; the ecclesiastical use appears to have arisen in English, in the 17th century.

If the It. is the original, and casacca 'cassock' the same word as casacca 'dwelling' (see above), then it is a deriv. of casa house (as if 'a garment that covers like a house': cf. CASULE, CHASUBLE); but the identification is doubtful. The Dict. de Trevoux suggests that casaque is a variant of Cosaque Cassack, from whom the military cassock might take its name. Lagarde (Götting. Gelehrte Anzeiger, 15 Apr. 1887, 238) maintains that F. casaque is a back-formation from casaguin (by incorrectly viewing the latter as a dimin. form), and that casaguin, It. casacchino, was a corruption of Arab. كاسغند kasāyand, ad. 3. A garment worn by clergymen.

a. A long close-fitting frock or tunic worn by Anglican clergymen, originally along with and under the gown; but, in recent times, also under the shortened surplice, and sometimes by 'High-Church' clergymen, like the soutane of Roman Catholic priests, apart from these vestments, as a kind of ecclesiastical garb. Also, sometimes worn by vergers, choristers, and others engaged in ecclesiastical functions. See quot.

In this sense, which appears to date from the Restoration, it seems to be the continuation of the scholar's cassock; in sense 2; it had probably some reference to the canon of 60 years before, requiring clergymen not to appear in public without coats or cassocks' (see sense 2).

1663 KILLIGREW Parson's Wedding (Fairh.) He was so poor and despicable, he could not avow his calling for want of a cassock. 1666 Purvs Diary 27 Sept. XII. Sort, kind, style, quality, stamp, type, as determined by characteristics.

This section, which is of modern use, and chiefly since 1700, appears to blend figurative uses of many of the foregoing senses, VIII–XI, one or more of these being prominent, according to the feeling of the moment. Casuistry (kæ-si-ur-i-strī, kær-zi-ur-). [f. CASUIST + -RY. App. at first contemptuous = 'the casuist's trade'; cf. sophistry, Jesuitry, foolery. A term of more respectful application would prob. have been casuism: Fr. has la casuistique, as if 'casuistics'.]

The science, art, or reasoning of the casuist; that part of Ethics which resolves cases of conscience, applying the general rules of religion and morality to particular instances in which 'circumstances alter cases', or in which there appears to be a conflict of duties. Often (and perhaps originally) applied to a quibbling or evasive way of dealing with difficult cases of duty; sophistry.

Morals* II. vi. 247 Granted that duties may clash, or that general rules may be modified by special circumstances, it is surely most important to determine beforehand, as far as we can, what those circumstances are, and, in the case of clashing duties, which should yield to the other. Now this, and this alone, is the task which 'Casuistry' or the attempt to 'resolve cases of conscience' proposes to itself.

Cat (kæt), sb. 1. Forms: 1 catte, catt, 2-7 catt, 4-6 catte, (3-7 kat, 6 katte), 1- cat. [The ME. and mod. cat corresponds at once to OE. cat and ONF. cat. The name is common European of unknown origin: found in Lat. and Gr. in 1-4th c., and in the modern langs. generally, as far back as their records go. Byzantine Gr. had kátta (in Cæsius c 350) and later kárros, as familiar terms = αἰλουρος; mod.Gr. has γάτα from Ital. Latin had catta in Martial a 100, and in the Old Latin Bible version ('Itala'), where it renders αἰλουρος. Palladius, c 350, has calus, elsewhere scanned cālus (Lewis and Short), and prob. in both cases properly cattus. From cattus, catta, came all the Romanic forms, It. gatto, Sp. gato, Cat. gat, Pr. cat, ONF. cat, F. chat, with corresponding feminines gatta, gata, cata, cate, chate, chatte. The Teutonic forms recorded are OE. cat, catt, ON. kött-r (= kattus) masc., genit. kattar (Sw. katt, Da. kat); also OE. cattē fem., WGer. **katta* (MLG. kattē, MDu. kattē, kat, Du. kat, also Sw. katta), OHG. chazzad (MHG., mod.G. katzē) fem.; OHG. had also chataro, MHG. katero, kater, mod.G. and Du. kater, he-cat.

The OTeut. types of these would be **kattuz* masc., **kattōn* fem., **kat(a)zon* masc.; but as no form of the word is preserved in Gothic, it is not certain that it goes back to the OTeut. period. It was at least WGer. c 400-450. It is also in Celtic: OIr. cat masc., Gael. cat com., Welsh and Cornish cath f., Breton kas, Vannes kac'h m. Also in Slavonic, with type kat: OSlav. koťka f., Bulg. katka, Slovenish kat m., Russ. kot m., kotchka, koshka f., Pol. kot (kośur m.), Boh. kat m., kočka f., Sorabian kořka; also Lith. kate; Finnish katti.

(These forms indicate extensive communication of the word, but do not fix the original source. History points to Egypt as the earliest home of the domestic cat, and the name is generally sought in the same quarter; Martial's attribute might incline us to a Slavonic or Teutonic origin: c 75 MARTIAL xiii. 69 Pannonicas nobis nuncum degit Umbria cattas. a 250 Barnab vi. 21 ('Itala') Noctue et hirundines et aves, similiter et cattas [LXX. καὶ αἰλουροί].

A name given to a vessel formerly used in the coal and timber trade on the north-east coast of England; see Falconer's description (quot. 1769).

These vessels are generally built remarkably strong, and carry from four to six hundred tons. Chatte, a small two-masted vessel, formed like a cat or Norwegian pink. 1794 Rigging & Seamanship I. 236 Cat, a vessel, used by the Northern Nations of Europe, with three masts and a bowsprit, rigged similar to an English ship; having, however, pole-masts and no top-gallant sails. c. 1825 J. DUGDALE New Brit. Trav. iv. 393 Certain vessels, called Ipswich Cats of large tonnage . . . formerly employed in the coal-trade here.

(The name is unknown to the oldest of the Elder Brethren of Trinity House, Newcastle (aged 82), and to the oldest North Sea pilots there. One of the latter, however, remembers to have heard as a boy the joke 'Do you know when the mouse caught the cat' (the Mouse being a sand-bank in the Thames); and several remember the expression cat-built in the early part of the century. The last 'cat-built' ship is said to have been lost more than 30 years ago.)

Hence (perh.) cat-boat, a kind of sailing-boat having the mast placed very forward and rigged with one sail; cat-rig, a rig of one fore-and-aft mainsail, used for pleasure-boats in smooth water; so cat-rigged adj.; cat-built (see above).

1. A subterranean place for the burial of the dead, consisting of galleries or passages with recesses excavated in their sides for tombs.

a. Representing the Latin catacumbas (catecumbas), or (?) ad catacumbas, used as early as the 5th c. in connexion with the subterranean cemetery under the Basilica of St. Sebastian, on the Appian Way, near Rome, in or near which the bodies of the apostles Peter and Paul were said to have been deposited: this is the only sense in which the word occurs in English before the 17th c.

b. In later times applied (in the plural) to all the subterranean cemeteries lying around Rome (which, after having been long covered up and forgotten, were fortuitously discovered in 1578). In the singular applied to a single crypt or gallery.

1662 J. BARGRAVE *Pope Alex. 2. In a wider sense, applied to any subterranean receptacle of dead bodies, as the catacumbes of Paris, which are worked-out stone-quarries (see quot.); also fig. place of entombment of former races of animals, etc.

1836 PENNY Cycl. VI. 359/4 The catacumbes of Paris could not be called catacumbes with any propriety until very recent times, when, by a decree of the French government, all the churchyards were emptied of their contents, and the skulls and bones sent to the spacious subterranean quarries, where they are now arranged in a manner that is grotesquely horrible. 1845 DARWIN Jour. Nat. iv. (1859) 80 This point being a perfect catacomb for monsters of extinct races.

3. transf. A place arranged with crypts and recesses, like the catacumbes.

[NOTE.—The name regularly applied to the Roman catacumbes during the first four centuries, when they were in use, as well as during the succeeding four or five centuries, while they were still objects of attention and care, was cemeterium. Catacumbas, catecumbas, appears in the 4th (?), 5th, and following centuries only in connexion with the name of the cemetery of St. Sebastian on the Appian Way, which is distinguished as Cemeterium Catacumbas, or shortly Catacumbas. In other cases Catacumbas appears to be used as name of the locality, or perhaps of the part of the Appian Way, in which this cemetery lay. The earliest instances are: 1400 Inscr. in Orrelli 4575 Comparau . . . ius in catacumbas [ad] lumenarem a flossore . . . 411 [?] 1354 Martyrology (Bucher ad Canon. Pasch. 237) Deposito martyrum. Decimo tertio Kalendas Februarii, Fabiani in Calistis et Sebastiani in Catacumbas. Tertio Kalendas Iulij, Petri in Catacumbas et Pauli Ostiense. a 600 (List of Cemeteries) Cimenterium catacumbas in St. Sebastianum Via Appia. a 600 GREG. MAGN. Epist. iv. Ind. xii. Ep. 30 In loco qui dicitur catacumbas collocata sunt. a 700 Imperio Caesarum (Eccard Corp. Hist. Med. Aet. I. 31) Maxentius (A. D. 312) Termas in Palatio fecit et Circum in Catacumbas. c 700 BEDA De Sex Aet. Romæ, Cemeteria Calisti juxta Catacumbas.

The evidence does not settle the disputed question whether the name originally belonged to the cemetery, or (as the majority of investigators now appear to think) to the locality,

Some of the other cemeteries were named from their locality, e.g. Ostiense, Ad Septem Columbas, Ad Duas Lauros (names of taverns), but most from a personal name as Calisti, Donatillæ, Cyriacæ. The word catacumbas was in later times treated as an acc. pl., with nom. sing. catacumba; but in earlier use it appears to be invariable. To account for this, some have surmised that the full name was Ad Catacumbas, others that it was itself a Greek phrase κατὰ κύβας. The recorded meanings of Gr. κύβη are 'the hollow of a vessel, a drinking vessel, cup, or bowl (whence a possibility that κατὰ κύβας was the name of a tavern); a boat, L. cymba; a knapsack, wallet'. But the question how a Greek phrase was likely to become the name of something near Rome, when it is not known what that thing was, is manifestly futile; still more profitless are conjectures that the word might contain the Greek preposition combined with a Latin, Sabine, or Celtic word or root, which may be seen in works or articles treating of the Catacumbes. There appear to be no examples of the application of the word to the other Roman subterranean cemeteries in ancient times, though catacumba is apparently used by Joannes Diaconus (9th c.) of those of Naples; see Du Cange. But the actual extension of the name belongs to modern times, since the discovery of 'Subterranean Rome'.

A name given to several astringent substances, containing from 40 to 55 per cent. of tannin, which are obtained from the bark, wood, or fruits of various Eastern trees and shrubs. They are used in medicine, and in tanning, calico printing, and dyeing.

The name was apparently first applied (in Europe) to the pale sort called also GAMBIR, obtained from the leaves and young shoots of Uncaria or Nauclaea Gambir; this is the Catechu of Pharmacy (Syd. Soc. Lex.): when first brought to Europe in the 17th c. it was from its appearance believed to be an earth, and called Terra Japonica. The dark sort obtained from the wood of Acacia Catechu, is more commonly called Cutch; of this Pegu Catechu is a good variety. (There is doubt whether the connexion with Japan assumed in the name terra japonica is not purely imaginary, and owing to the Burmese name for Acacia Catechu, sha-pin, shabin, or shaben.)

Category (kæt'gōri), [ad. L. categoria, a. Gr. κατηγορία accusation, assertion, predication, abst. sb. from κατήγορος accuser, etc.: see CATEGOREM.]

1. Logic and Metaph. A term (meaning literally 'predication' or 'assertion') given to certain general classes of terms, things, or notions; the use being very different with different authors.

a. Originally used by Aristotle, the nature and meaning of whose ten categories, or predicaments (as, after the Latin translation, they are also called) has been disputed almost from his own day till the present; some holding that they were 'a classification of all the manners in which assertions may be made of the subject', others that they were 'an enumeration of all things capable of being named, the most extensive classes into which things could be distributed', or again, that they were 'the different kinds of notions corresponding to the definite forms of existence'. Hence many criticisms of Aristotle's classification, with modifications of it, or the substitution of new 'categories', proposed by the Stoics, and later philosophers, according as they viewed them logically or metaphysically.

The ten 'categories' or 'predicaments' of Aristotle were: 1 Substance or being (οὐσία), 2 Quantity, 3 Quality, 4 Relation (συνέχεσις), 5 Place, 6 Time, 7 Posture (κίνησις), 8 Having or possession (ἔχειν), 9 Action, 10 Passion.

1588 FRAUNCE Lawiers Logike i. ii. 10 b, These general heades of argumentes . . . sometimes . . . are called Categories, and the handling or discoursing of the same Categories. 1677 GALE Crit. Gentiles II. iv. Proem 4 Objective Ideas or real Beings, considered in Logic, are reduced by the Aristoteleans . . . to Ten Categories or Predicaments. 1724 WATTS Logic (1736) 25 The famous ten Ranks of Being, called the ten Predicaments or Categories of Aristotle, on which there are endless Volumes of Discourses formed by several of his Followers. 1849 ASP. THOMSON Laus Th. § 97 Logicians in almost every age have endeavoured to frame schemes of classification in which things should be arranged according to their real nature. To these the name of Categories . . . has been given. 1858 MANSER. Bampton Lect. iii. (ed. 4) 49 Existence itself, that so-called highest category of thought. c 1866 GROVE Aristotle I. 144 We may illustrate the ten Categories of Aristotle by comparing them with the four Categories of the Stoics. Ibid. 149 Galen also recognizes five Categories; but not the same five as Plotinus. 1882 E. WALLACE tr. Aristotle's Psychol. 5 The first point . . . is to determine in which of the higher classes soul is included, and what is its generic character—whether, in other words, it is an individual thing and real substance, or a quality, or a quantity, or any other of the categories, as they have been distinguished. 1883 LINDBL & SCOTT Grk. Lex. s.v. The categories are a classification of all the manners in which assertions may be made of the subject.

b. Kant applied the term to: The pure a priori conceptions of the understanding, which the mind applies (as forms or frames) to the matter of knowledge received from sense, in order to raise it into an intelligible notion or object of knowledge. 1829 SIR W. HAMILTON Disc. (1853) 26 The Predicaments of Aristotle are . . . objective, of things as understood; those of Kant subjective, of the mind as understanding. In reality, the whole Kantian Categories would be generally excluded from those of Aristotle. . . as determinations of thought, and not genera of real things. 1856 MEIKLEJOHN tr. Kant's Crit. Pure Reason 64 In this manner there arise exactly so many pure conceptions of the understanding, applying a priori to objects of intuition in general, as there are logical functions in all possible judgments. . . These conceptions we shall, with Aristotle, call categories, our purpose being originally identical with his, notwithstanding the great difference in the execution. Table of the Categories. 1. Of Quantity: Unity, Plurality, Totality. 2. Of Quality: Reality, Negation, Limitation. 3. Of Relation: Of Inherence and Substance (substantia et accidentis), of Causality and Dependence (cause and effect), of Community (reciprocity between the agent and patient). 4. Of Modality: Possibility—Impossibility, Existence—Non-existence, Necessity—Contingence. 1877 E. CAIRD Philos. Kant ii. viii. 342 Certain general conceptions which are principles of relation for all the manifold of sense. . . these are the categories.

2. A predicament; a class to which a certain predication or assertion applies. 1678 R. BARCLAY Apol. Quakers v. xxvi. 187 He that cannot hear a thing, as being necessarily absent, and he that cannot hear it, as being naturally deaf, are to be placed in the same Category. 1855 MACAULAY Hist. Eng. IV. 228 Any offender who was not in any of the categories of prescription. 1856 MISS MULOCK F. Halifax (ed. 17) 382 Lord Ravenel's case would hardly come under this category. 1880 Nat. Responsib. Opini Trade 24 To place opium in the same category as alcohol and tobacco.

b. A class, or division, in any general scheme of classification. 1660 JER. TAYLOR Duct. Dubit. i. v. Doubts . . . must be derived from their several heads and categories. 1828 HAZLITT Eng. Poets v. (1870) 129 With him there are but two moral categories, riches and poverty. 1856 EMERSON *Eng. Cateran (kæ'térán). Forms: 6 ketheri (n)ek, ketharin, catherein, 8 kethrin, (kathrine), 9 catheran, katheran, cateran. [Lowland Sc. catherein, kethrin, appears to represent Gael. ceathairne collective 'peasantry', whence ceathairneach 'sturdy fellow, freebooter' (McAlpine); Cormac has Ir. ceithern, which O'Donovan renders 'band of soldiers', whence ceithernach 'one of a band'.

The th has long been mute in Celtic, and the Ir. ceithern (kæ'térn) is phonetically represented by Eng. KERN. It is not easy to account for the preservation of the dental in Lowland Sc., unless perh. through the intermediation of med. L. as in Bower's cateranus. (Stokes refers ceithern to Qld. **keithern*, O.Celt. keitherna, a fem. ā-stem.)

Cater-cousin (kæ'tar-kəz'n). [derivation and original literal meaning doubtful.]

The ordinary conjecture (since Skinner) has been that cater is F. quatre four, used in the sense of quatrième fourth, 'from the ridiculousness of calling cousin or relation to so remote a degree' (Johnson); but etymologically this receives no support from French (where quatre-cousin would be absurdly impossible, nor from the Eng. use of cater in CATER sb., CATER adv., or CATERCAP, nor is there any trace of the word having ever been quatre, quatre, or quartier; moreover Johnson's explanation seems hardly to suit early usage, however it may have influenced later use.

Fewer difficulties appear in supposing cater to be the Eng. CATER sb. or v., and taking cater-cousin as originally those who were 'cousins' by being catered for or boarded together, or by catering for each other: cf. companion lit. 'fellow bread-eater'. It would be easiest perhaps to account for such a formation from the verb, but as there is not at present evidence that this was in use so early as 1547, we must consider the possibility that the derivation was cater sb. + cousin, perh. as 'catering cousin': cf. esp. foister-father, mother, brother, sister, etc.]

A term formerly applied to persons on terms of 'cousinship', intimate friendship, or familiarity with each other, who, though not cousins by blood, were 'next cousins' in some respect, or perhaps called each other 'cousin' from some community of life, interests, or employments (cf. COUSIN, to CALL cousins 17 b.). To be (or be made) cater cousins: to be good friends, to be on the best of terms. It still survives as a traditional expression (chiefly from Shakspeare), but without any distinct notion of its intrinsic meaning.

1547 LATIMER Serm. & Rem. (1845) 425 Corrupt nature [is] against the will of God; and so to be natural may seem to be cater-cousin, or cousin-germain with to be diabolical. 1583 *Strubbs Anat. Caterpillar (kæ'tarpilār). Forms: 5 cater-pyl, 6 -pyllar, caterpillar, 7 caterpillar, 7-8 -pyllar, 6- caterpillar, -pyllar. [Catyrpel, in Prompt. Parv., may be merely an error of the scribe for catyrpelour (or -er); Palsgr. has the full form. Generally compared with the synonymous OF. chatelose, lit. 'hairy or downy cat' (cf. the Sc. name hairy woubit 'woolly bear'), of which the ONF. would be catelose. This is a possible source, though no connexion is historically established: the final sibilant might be treated in Eng. as a pl. formative, and the supposed sing. catelose would be readily associated with the well-known word pillor, pillour, pillager, plunderer, spoiler. This is illustrated by the fact that in the fig. sense, pillor and caterpillar are used synonymously in a large number of parallel passages (see sense 2). The regular earlier spelling was with -er; the corruption caterpillar (? after pyllar), occasional in 17th c., was adopted by Johnson, and has since prevailed.

(Some think the word a direct compound of pyllor. The giving to hairy caterpillars a name derived from the cat, is seen not only in the French word cited, but also in Lombard. gattia, gattola (cat, kitten), Swiss teufelskatz (devil's cat); cf. also F. chenille (— canicula little dog), Milan. can, cagnon (dog, pup) a silk-worm (Wedgwood). Cf. also catkin, F. chaton, applied to things resembling hairy caterpillars.)

Caterwaul (kæ'tarwɔl), v. Forms: 4-5 caterwawe, 4-6 -wawe, 6 katerwaue, 6-8 catterwawl, -wall, 8 -wowl, 7-9 -waul, 7 -waule, caterwaule, -wawl, catterwrawl, (catwrawl), 8 catterwaw, 6- catterwaul. [This occurs in the various forms caterwaue, -wawe, -wrawl(e), -wawle, -waul. The second element appears separately in the vb. wrawen used (of a cat) by Caxton, wrawlers, wrawle of cats, squalling children, etc., frequent in Googe, Tusser, Holland, and others from c 1570 to 1625 or later; wawl is of doubtful occurrence before 1600. The precise relation between these is not clear; all are prob. imitative of the sound, but whether the forms in -l are formed on the others (cf. meow, meowl, Ger. miauen, miaulen, and F. miauler) is doubtful.

Forms akin to wrawen, wrawl in other langs. are Da. vraale, Sw. vårla, to roar, bellow, bawl, Norw. dial. råla, in the north of Norway 'to cry as a cat', LG. wralen (Bremen Wbch.) said of a stallion in heat, also of an ill-behaved man, 'to be noisy and unruly'; cf. also Bavarian raulen, rauelen 'to howl, whine', said esp. of the cat, also Swiss raulen, räulen, the latter esp. of the cry of the cat when in heat. (Wv becomes r in HG.; an OE. **wrawulan*, ME. wrawulen would answer exactly to Bav. rauelen.) The sense of the Ger. words also comes near the Eng., since both in Chaucer and in the transf. use of the 16-17th c., the word was spec. applied to the cry and behaviour of the cat when 'after kind'. As to the -wrawl form, an exact LG. counterpart katterwraulen (von Kindern) schreien und heulen wie streitende Katzen' is given by Schambach, Göttingisches Grubenhagensches Idiotikon 1858, but its history is uncertain; cf. also Icel. valla to wail.

Cater is, of course, connected with CAT, but the form is not certainly explained: some would see in it a parallel to Du. and Ger. kater male cat, which may once have existed in OE.; but the word appears too late to prove this. Others would take -er as some kind of suffix or connective merely.]

II. In ecclesiastical use.

The earlier history of this lies outside English, and may be found in such works as Smith's Dict. Christian Antiq. or in Lightfoot's Ignatius i. 398-400, 605-607; II. 310-312. 'Ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία' the catholic church or church universal', was first applied to the whole body of believers as distinguished from an individual congregation or 'particular body of Christians'. But to the primary idea of extension 'the ideas of doctrine and unity' were super-added; and so the term came to connote the Church first as orthodox, in opposition to heretics; next as one historically, in opposition to schismatics. Out of this widest qualitative sense arose a variety of subordinate senses; it was applied to the faith the Church held, to particular communities or even individual members belonging to it, and especially in the East, to cathedrals as distinguished from parish churches, then later to parish churches as opposed to oratories or monastic chapels. After the separation of East and West 'Catholic' was assumed as its descriptive epithet by the Western or Latin Church, as 'Orthodox' was by the Eastern or Greek. At the Reformation the term 'Catholic' was claimed as its exclusive right by the body remaining under the Roman obedience, in opposition to the 'Protestant' or 'Reformed' National Churches. These, however, also retained the term, giving it, for the most part, a wider and more ideal or absolute sense, as the attribute of no single community, but only of the whole communion of the saved and saintly in all churches and ages. In England, it was claimed that the Church, even as Reformed, was the national branch of the 'Catholic Church' in its proper historical sense. As a consequence, in order to distinguish the unreformed Latin Church, its chosen epithet of 'Catholic' was further qualified by 'Roman'; but see sense 7. On this analogy ANGLICO-CATHOLIC has been used by some, since about 1835, of the Anglican Church.

5. Catholic Church, Church Catholic: the Church universal, the whole body of Christians.

1559 Injunctions by Queens Majesty D iv. Ye shall praye for Christes holy Chatholique church, that is, for the whole congregation of Christian people, dispeised throughout the whole worlde, and specially for the Church of England and Irelande. 1560-61 Scottish Conf. Ch. xi. (1847) 110 As members of the church catholic. Mod. In this sense many accept the article of the Creed, 'I believe in the holy catholic church'.

b. Of or belonging to the church universal, universal Christian.

6. As an epithet, applied to the Ancient Church, as it existed undivided, prior to the separation of East and West, and of a church or churches standing in historical continuity therewith, and claiming to be identical with it in doctrine, discipline, orders, and sacraments. (a.) After the separation, assumed by the Western or Latin Church, and so commonly applied historically. (b.) After the Reformation in the 16th c. claimed as its exclusive title by that part of the Western Church which remained under the Roman obedience (see 7); but (c.) held by Anglicans not to be so limited, but to include the Church of England, as the proper continuation in England, alike of the Ancient and the Western Church.

(Whatever the application, the implied sense is 'the Church or Churches which now truly represent the ancient undivided Church of Christendom'.)

7. As applied (since the Reformation) to the Church of Rome (Ecclesia apostolica catholica Romana) = ROMAN CATHOLIC, q.v. (Opposed to Protestant, Reformed, Evangelical, Lutheran, Calvinistic, etc.)

ROMAN CATHOLIC is the designation known to English law; but 'Catholic' is that in ordinary use on the continent of Europe, especially in the Latin countries; hence historians frequently contrast 'Catholic' and 'Protestant', especially in reference to the continent; and, in familiar non-contradictory use, 'Catholic' is often said instead of Roman Catholic.

See also CHATTEL. [ME. catel, a. ONF. catel (= central OF. chatel, Pr. capital, capdal) = late L. capitale, L. capitale, neuter of the adj. capitālis head-, principal, CAPITAL, used subst. in mediaeval times in the sense 'principal sum of money, capital, wealth, property'; cf. mod. Eng. CAPITAL = stock in trade. Thus Papias has 'capital, caput pecuniae, capitis summa', the Catholicon 'capital, pecunia'. Under the feudal system the application was confined to movable property or wealth, as being the only 'personal' property, and in English it was more and more identified with 'beast held in possession, live stock', which was almost the only use after 1500, exc. in the technical phrase 'goods and catells (cattals)' which survived till the 17th c. In legal Anglo-French, the Norman catel was superseded at an early period by the Parisian chatel; this continued to be used in the earlier and wider sense (subject however to legal definition), and has in modern times passed into a certain current use as CHATTEL, so that the phrase just cited is now also since 16th c. 'goods and chattels'. Down to 1500 the typical spelling was catel; in the 16th c. this became cattel, cattell; only since 1600, and chiefly since 1700, spelt cattle. As this spelling is never found in earlier use, and, hence, never in the earlier sense, it would be possible to treat this sense as a separate word Catel, property; but on the other hand the modern sense has all the forms catel, cattell, cattle, according to date, and the history is better elucidated by treating the word as a historical whole. CHATTEL, however, as a distinct modern form and sense, is dealt with in its own place.

OF. (besides the ch-forms, for which see CHATTEL) had, according to dialect and date, the forms catel, cathel, cathen, cattell. Hence the ME. variants cathel, cathail, ayel. The Norman word was again latinized as catalum, cattalum, the latter esp. current in English law-Latin, whence the forms cathel, cattall, so frequent in 15-16th c., esp. in the legal phrase 'goods and cattals'.]

3. Often used in the phrase Goods and cattel; later more frequently goods and cattels, of which the extant form is goods and chattels: see CHATTEL.

As in this sense the form cattals is specially prevalent, it looks like a translation of a legal Anglo-Lat. bona et cattalla. Du Cange quotes from Leg. Edu. Conf. c. 35 Cum decimis omnium terrarum, ac bonorum aliorum sive cattallorum. c 1430 Freemasonry 468 Take here goodes and here catelle Unto the kynge's bond, everydelle. c 1436 *Test. ¶ The transition to sense 4 is seen in the following:

II. Live stock. (Forms catel, cattell [I. cattle].)

4. A collective name for live animals held as property, or reared to serve as food, or for the sake of their milk, skin, wool, etc.

The application of the term has varied greatly, according to the circumstances of time and place, and has included camels, horses, asses, mules, oxen, cows, calves, sheep, lambs, goats, swine, etc. The tendency in recent times has been to restrict the term to the bovine genus, but the wider meaning is still found locally, and in many combinations. As this sense was originally comprised under 1, distinct instances before 1500 are scarce.

Caucht. obs. Sc. f. CATCH, CAUGHT.

Caucion. -cioun, -cyon, obs. ff. CAUTION.

Caucus (kō'kas). [Arose in New England: origin obscure.]

Alleged to have been used in Boston U. S. before 1724; quotations go back to 1763. Already in 1774 Gordon (Hist. Amer. Rev.) could obtain no 'satisfactory account of the origin of the name'. Mr. Pickering, in 1816, as a mere guess, thought it 'not improbable that caucus might be a corruption of caulkers, the word "meetings" being understood'. For this, and the more detailed statement quoted in Webster, there is absolutely no evidence beyond the similarity of sound; and the word was actually in use before the date (1770) of the event mentioned in Webster. Dr. J. H. Trumbull (Proc. Amer. Philol. Assoc. 1872) has suggested possible derivation from an Algonkin word cau-cau-as-n, which occurs in Capt. Smith's Virginia 23, as Caw-cawassough 'one who advises, urges, encourages', from a vb. meaning primarily 'to talk to', hence 'to give counsel, advise, encourage', and 'to urge, promote, incite to action'. For such a derivation there is claimed the general suitability of the form and sense, and it is stated that Indian names were commonly taken by clubs and secret associations in New England; but there appears to be no direct evidence.]

2. In English newspapers since 1878, generally misused, and applied opprobriously to a committee or organization charged with seeking to manage the elections and dictate to the constituencies, but which is, in fact, usually a representative committee popularly elected for the purpose of securing concerted political action in a constituency.

It was first applied in 1878, by Lord Beaconsfield and the Times newspaper, to the organization of the Birmingham Liberal 'Six Hundred', and thence to those which were speedily formed on its model elsewhere; the implication being that this was an introduction of 'the American system' into English politics, which deserved to be branded with an American name. But the name was grotesquely misapplied: in American use, a caucus is a meeting; English newspapers apply the caucus to an organization or system. Such organizations have since been, in one form or another, adopted by all parties; and caucus is now a term which partisans fling at the organizations of their opponents, and disclaim for their own.

The meaning would then be a mound or dam made firm by stamping or treading down.

This is strengthened by the fact that calciāre in med.L. interchanges with calcare 'to tread, stamp', and that calciāta, calciatum are actually found instead of calciāta, calciatum; also calciagium for the droit de chaussée or road-toll. Dies and others have conjectured a vib. of type **calciāre*, or **calciāre*, from calz, calcem 'limb', and taken calciāta as something built or formed with lime; but there is no trace of such a sense in any language. In English occurring with great variety of spelling and pronunciation, after Italian and French, with various native modifications. Originally, caviā-ly, -ā-le, -ā-rie, -ā-re was of 4 syllables, with accent on the penult, as in Italian, but was sometimes reduced to 3 syllables, by slurring -iā-, as -yā-, and later with the accent shifted to the first syllable. As early as 1625, the final -e, in caviare, caveare, was often dropped in speech, and later also in writing, giving caviar, cavear (cf. F. caviar), pronounced (kavi'ā-ry, -ē-ry), sometimes (kavi'yā-ry, -yē-ry), and perh. also with accent shifted (kavi'ā-ry, -iā-ry, -yā-ry).

About 1700, prevalent forms were cavear, caveer, riming with prepare, and cheer; the latter pronunciation appears to have been the only one in common use in the end of the 18th c., for Walker, 1797, who spells caviare and pronounces (kavi'ē-ry), says, 'Either the spelling or the pronunciation of this word should be altered. . . the ancient spelling seems to have been Caviare; though Buchanan and Bailey, in compliance with pronunciation, spell it Cavear, W. Johnston Cavear, and Ash, as a less usual spelling, Cavier.'

Smart (1846) pronounces (kavi'yē-ry), Webster has the accent on first syllable (kæ'viā-ry); prevalent pronunciations in England at present are kavi'ā-ry, kavi'yā-ry, which are etymologically the best, also (kavi'ē-ry), and as in Smart. Shakspeare's caviarie, and Swift's caveer, are recognized archaic forms.]

Littré cites Carib Acayolman 'crocodile', from Dict. Fr. Caraïbe of P. Raymond Breton, 1661.

Very positive statements, however, assert the word to be African, from Congo; Pigafetta 1598 (trav. in Yule) says 'In this river (Zaire or Congo)... mighty great crocodiles, which the country people there call caiman'. And Cuvier Règne Animal, Sauri (transl.) IX. 296 says 'The slaves on their arrival from Africa, at sight of a crocodile, gave it immediately the name of cayman'. It would appear from this that it was the negroes who spread the name throughout America'. But as Bontius 1631 (cited by Yule) says Cayman is the name 'per totam Indiam' (i.e. the East Indies), the name appears to be one of those like anconda and bom, boma, which the Portuguese or Spaniards very early caught up in one part of the world, and naturalized in another.]

(recorded of date 1428) and the derived ceiling (1380), ceiled, with the cognate sb. found as CYLL in sense of 'canopy' c1500, celure, found as syllure, cyllure ? a 1400, the derivation is doubtful. The group is not very old in Eng., and traces of it in French are scanty.

Three sources have been suggested: (1) L. celāre, F. celer (with c in Litré) to hide, conceal, cover up; (2) L. calāre to carve, engrave in relief; (3) L. calum sky, vault of heaven. If L. celāre could be shown to have acquired in late L. or Romanic the simple sense of 'cover', it would suitably explain the Eng. words in all their uses; but such is not the case, and in particular, F. celer does not appear to approach the required sense. In favour of L. calāre (cf. cieler Godef.) there are certainly early quotations (see sense 1, and CEILING 1) in which 'carve', 'carving', is a possible sense; but nothing of the kind occurs under celāre, and if ceil ever meant 'carve' this sense evidently soon entirely gave way to one congruous with that of celāre. On the other hand we have the known fact that med. L. calum, It. cielo, F. ciel, acquired the sense of 'canopy, vault, roof, tester of a bed, etc.'; and there are traces of a derived vb. calāre to canopy or vault, whence calārum, calātūra, in senses identical with or derived from calum. Difficulties are that while ceil v. and celure were so common in 15-16th c. English, and can hardly be connected with L. exc. through Fr., their occurrence in OF. itself is extremely rare: a single instance of cieler pa. pple. (with variants celae, chelee, couverte) has been noted in Chrestien de Troyes, Yvain (ed. Forster 964). It is possible that **celure*, **celure*—L. calātūra was common in Anglo-French, and thence passed into English, but the whole subject remains for the present beset with conflicting difficulties; the apparently certain point being that we cannot separate the Eng. words from calum, ciel, canopy. An artificial substance composed chiefly of cellulose, and much used as a substitute for ivory, bone, coral, etc., in the manufacture of knife-handles, piano-keys, billiard-balls, etc.

Invented in America, and first patented in Gt. Britain in April 1871, as a material for dental plates. In its manufacture the cellulose is first reduced by acids to pyroxyline (gun-cotton), camphor is then added, and the mixture subjected to immense hydraulic pressure. It may then be moulded by heat and pressure to any shape, and it becomes hard, elastic, and capable of taking on a fine finish. (The Specification of Hyatt's first British patent (1871, No. 1025) does not contain the name.)

1. Hist. Applied to the ancient peoples of Western Europe, called by the Greeks Κέλται, Κέλται, and by the Romans Celtæ.

The Κέλται of the Greeks, also called Γαλάται, Galatæ, appear to have been the Gauls and their continental kin as a whole; by Cæsar the name Celtæ was restricted to the people of middle Gaul (Gallia Celtica), but most other Roman writers used it of all the Galli or Gauls, including the peoples in Spain and Upper Italy believed to be of the same language and race; the ancients apparently never extended the name to the Britons.

This obstinate war between the insular Britons and the continental Celts. 1839 THIRLWALL Greece VIII. 417 The Celts advanced within five or six days' march of his camp.

2. A general name applied in modern times to peoples speaking languages akin to those of the ancient Galli, including the Bretons in France, the Cornish, Welsh, Irish, Manx, and Gaelic of the British Isles.

This modern use began in French, and in reference to the language and people of Brittany, as the presumed representatives of the ancient Gauls: with the recognition of linguistic affinities it was extended to the Cornish and Welsh, and so to the Irish, Manx, and Scottish Gaelic. Celtic has thus become a name for one of the great branches of the Aryan family of languages (see CELTIC); and the name Celt has come to be applied to any one who speaks (or is descended from those who spoke) any Celtic language. But it is not certain that these constitute one race ethnologically; it is generally held that they represent at least two 'races', markedly differing in physical characteristics. Popular notions, however, associate 'race' with language, and it is common to speak of the 'Celts' and 'Celtic race' as an ethnological unit having certain supposed physical and moral characteristics, especially as distinguished from 'Saxon' or 'Teuton'.

Celt (se'lt). [ad. (reputed) Lat. celt-es (or ?celte, ?celtis) 'stone-chisel, sculptor's chisel'.

The received or Clementine text of the Vulgate has in Job xix. 24 Stylo ferreo, et planibz laminis, vel celte sculptantur in silice; but, though this is the reading of some MSS., the Codex Amiatinus and others read certe 'surely'. Some hold certe to be the original reading (representing ἔργον of the Heb., 'for ever' of the Eng., which is not expressed by the LXX), and take celte as an erroneous alteration of some kind; others think celte a genuine word, and suppose that it was originally a marginal gloss on stylo, which was erroneously taken into the text, and subsequently altered to certe by some one to whom it was perhaps unfamiliar. But the independent evidence for a word celtes or celte is slender. The 'vetus inscriptio Romæ', cited by Du Cange, is a late forgery, and celte in it is app. from the Vulgate. One of the miscellaneous undated glosses in the Glossarium C. Labbei (Stephens' Thesaurus) is 'Ἰνδὸν Celte', but this is prob. later than the Vulgate variant reading, and may be founded on it. Later also than the Vulgate is the gloss on Sidonius Epist. vii. 3 (Anecd. Oxon., Class. Ser. I. v. p. xi. and 50) 'Hoc caelum, ut hoc celte, celis, instrumentum est quo caelatur', which shows the ordinary explanation of the word in the Middle Ages. Celtes occurs however in two charters given in Lacomblet Urkundenbuch für die Geschichte des Niederrheins, II. 331 (anno 1267) 'meatum seu transitum... ex fovea capituli Coloniensis, ad educendum celtes seu framina lapidum per viam eandem', and II. 382 (anno 1329) 'quod nulli frangentes lapides seu alii quicunque prociens seu mittent celtes seu alia fragmenta in ipsam foveam'. Here the meaning is 'pieces or fragments, ?chips', of stone; the relation of this to the Vulgate word is uncertain. In Welsh, maen celit, with the assumed meaning 'flint stone', occurs in the Triads of Wisdom (16-17th c.), in Myr. Arch. III. 246; and celit is also said to be (or to have been) known in Breconshire, in the sense of 'shell' of a nut, etc.; but the status of the word is altogether obscure, and its alleged senses help the question little. In any case, celtes, whatever its origin and character, was assumed, on the authority of the Vulgate, to be a genuine word; and, as such, the term was admitted into the technical vocabulary of Archaeology, about 1700 'In Beger's Thesaurus Brandenburgicus 1666 a bronze celt adapted for insertion in its haft is described under the name of celtes' (Ll. Jewitt Half-hours among Eng. Antig. 1877, p. 32). Apparently the general adoption of the word by antiquaries was influenced by a fancied etymological connexion with CELT: thus the Grand Dict. of Larousse explains it as 'sorte de hache gauloise en bronze'.

It appears to have served for a variety of purposes, as a hoe, chisel, or axe, and perhaps as a weapon of war. 3. A hundredth. ? Obs.

1685 J. WARNER in Boyle Hist. Air xvii. (1692) 134 The Mercury subside 9 Cents of an Inch.

4. In various monetary systems the term used for the hundredth part of a standard unit.

a. In United States of America (also in Canada, British Guiana, and many other British colonies): The hundredth part of a dollar; a copper (or nickel) coin of this value, nearly equal to a half-penny of Great Britain. (Often taken as the type of the smallest current coin; whence such expressions as 'I don't care a cent for'.)

Apparently the first mention of cent occurs in the letter of Robert Morris to the U.S. Congress in 1782, suggesting that the American monetary unit should be the 1/100 of a dollar, and that a coin equal to 100 of these or 1/100 of a dollar (about 324. Eng.) should be made, and called a cent. This proposal was not taken up; but it may have suggested the name 'cent' for the coin = 1/100 of a dollar, ordained by the Continental Congress on 8 August 1786 (see quot.). There exists, however, an American copper token, commonly called the Washington cent, bearing on one side a head in a wreath with the legend 'Washington and Independence', and date '1783'; on the other the words 'One Cent', and the exergue 1787. But it is not certain that 1783 represents the date of issue; this token was probably struck as late as 1789, the date 1783 being merely that of the conclusion of the War of Independence. Previously to the coining of the cent, or 1/100 of a dollar, and down to 1789, accounts were kept in dollars and ninetieths, a relic of the time when the Spanish piastre or piece of eight reals, called by the colonists 'dollar', was worth 75.6d. (90 pence) of the money of account of Maryland and Pennsylvania. (From notes communicated by the late Prof. J. W. Andrews of Marietta Coll., Ohio.)

Centripetum appello.] 1709 Tatler No. 43 ¶ 7 Thus the Tangential and Centripetal Forces, by their Counter-struggle, make the Celestial Bodies describe an exact Ellipsis. 1764 KEMP Inquiry II. § 9 Centripetal force is put for the cause, which we conceive to be some power or virtue in the centre or central body. 1847-4 [see CENTRIFUGAL.] 1868 LOCKYER *Elem. 6. By a change of construction, a person or agent is said to be certain to do a thing, when the fact that he will do it is certain. The use thus attaches itself logically to 1, and in such a sentence as 'the town is certain to be taken', certain might be referred to that sense.

II. 7. Used to define things which the mind definitely individualizes or particularizes from the general mass, but which may be left without further identification in description; thus often used to indicate that the speaker does not choose further to identify or specify them: in sing. = a particular, in pl. = some particular, some definite.

Different as this seems to be from sense 1, it is hardly separable from it in a large number of examples: thus, in the first which follows, the hour was quite 'certain' or 'fixed', but it is not communicated to the reader; to him it remains, so far as his knowledge is concerned, quite indefinite; it may have been, as far as he knows, at any hour; though, as a fact, it was at a particular hour.
